A brief history of the award

The Hunter Award was established in 1972 in memory of Sir Thomas Hunter who was the first professor of psychology appointed in New Zealand. He also established the first psychology clinic, modelled on the clinic established by Lightner Witmer, the founder of clinical psychology. The Hunter Award is an award of distinction reflecting long-term, potentially life-time, achievement in either scholarship and research and/or in the professional practice of psychology. It is the first award ever offered by the NZPsS.

Aims of the award

The Hunter Award recognises and encourages excellence in scholarship, research, and professional achievement in psychology. It is recognised that exceptional individuals may qualify under both the scholarship/research criteria and the professional practice criteria.

Nature of the award

The Award is offered every three years, with the scholarship/research award alternating with the professional practice award. The recipient of the Hunter Award receives $1000 and is invited to present the "Sir Thomas Hunter Address" at the NZPsS conference in the following year (or as soon as possible thereafter), and is invited to submit a paper based on the award to either of the NZPsS publications Journal of Psychology or Psychology Aotearoa.

Eligibility criteria

To be eligible for the Hunter Award, nominees must be current members of the NZPsS and have been a member for a minimum of five years prior to nomination.

The Awards Committee will consider nominees in terms of their being recognised as having a sustained history of notable and distinguished scholarship, research and/or professional achievement in psychology. The impact of their work in scholarship, research, and professional practice in the scientific and/or professional community, and possibly in the wider community in Aotearoa/New Zealand or elsewhere, will be a major factor in evaluating nominees.

Nomination process

Nominees are invited through NZPsS publications and the NZPsS website. The closing date for nominations will be advertised. Nominators need to be full members of the NZPsS and must have the nominee's written consent for the nomination.
